Comparative Literature, Cinema & Media is about exploring connections—connections among various literary, visual, and cultural traditions in a global world; connections between past and present; and connections across different academic disciplines and modes of intellectual inquiry.

Education

Comparative Literature, Cinema & Media trains students in the critical analysis of texts, seeking to understand how the rhetorical and aesthetic features of those texts—whether literary, visual, or theoretical—respond to and shape social values, attitudes, and beliefs. International in scope and interdisciplin ary in orientation, our department programs emphasize intellectual breadth and foster intellectual initiative by maximizing students’ opportunities to design and focus on their own courses of study.

Undergraduate students can pursue either a literary studies or a cinema and media studies major; graduate students can obtain certificates in textual and digital studies or cinema and media studies, along with their primary degree. While students choose a concentration in one national tradition, they also explore the place of that tradition within a global setting.

The Department of Comparative Literature, Cinema & Media offers an interdisciplinary program of study in Paris during autumn quarter each year. Students can earn 15 UW credits while living and working in one of the most vibrant and beautiful cities in the world. Our faculty have also developed and led programs in London, Rome, Beijing, and San Cristóbal de las Casas, Mexico.

Scholarship

Departmental research reflects the diversity of our faculty and students, with a wide range of scholarly, editorial, and translation projects underway. These include, for instance, studies of U.S., Chinese, South Asian, Southeast Asian, Eastern European, and Latin American cinemas; of European eighteenth-, nineteenth-, and twentieth-century literatures; of Southeast Asian and Latin American literatures; of theater, performance, and television studies; and of the history of psychoanalysis.

Outreach

Frequently in spring quarter, our graduate students work with other students in the Humanities to sponsor a graduate student conference in literature and cultural studies. International conferences that we have recently co-sponsored include the American Comparative Literature Association, 2015; the Piers Plowman Association, 2015; and the Society for Cinema and Media Studies Book Awards, 2014; and the Society for Textual Scholarship, 2014. We have also co-sponsored festivals of Asian, Latin American, Italian, and silent cinemas. Our faculty continues to collaborate closely with the Simpson Center for the Humanities on various projects, including guest lecturers, the Society of Scholars, and Texts and Teachers.
